Indeed, espionage is a word that brings in mind well-known 007 James Bond movies, which have shaped a common image of how a secret agent's job looks like. However, Bond only exists in Hollywood movies. Espionage, or casually said as spying, is broadly defined as an act that involves a government, company or individual acquiring secret information without the permission of the holder. Since it is a severe violation of the privacy and state sovereignty, the international society has established several international laws and treaties after cold war to protect individuals and states from being spied. On December 10, 2013, SOCHUM adopted a draft resolution affirming that surveillance and collection of personal information violate the universal human right to privacy and expression. This resolution is the single UN document addressing mass surveillance and is considered to be only the first step towards eliminating unlawful electronic espionage. Therefore, this issue remains on the agenda of SOCHUM. (This is just a sample, adopt from topic intro)
